

10-1-2002

Introduction

UB Law Forum

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.law.buffalo.edu/ub\_law\_forum

---

Recommended Citation

UB Law Forum (2002) "Introduction," UB Law Forum: Vol. 15 : No. 1 , Article 5.
Available at: https://digitalcommons.law.buffalo.edu/ub\_law\_forum/vol15/iss1/5

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Alumni Publications at Digital Commons @ University at Buffalo School of Law. It has been accepted for inclusion in UB Law Forum by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ University at Buffalo School of Law. For more information, please contact lawscholar@buffalo.edu.

REFLECTIONS ON TERROR AND LIBERTY

- 6 { Civil liberties
- 8 { Law enforcement
- 11 { Justice system
- 14 { Alumni war stories

"A date that will live in infamy."

Franklin D. Roosevelt said that about Dec. 7, 1941. Now the 21st century has its own date of infamy, and as the events of Sept. 11, 2001, continue to resonate on the U.S. and world stages, Americans are trying to put into perspective the most deadly terrorist attack ever in the United States.

As history goes, a year is scant opportunity to make a serious reflection on the attacks in New York City, Washington and Pennsylvania that killed 3,056 people. Yet the enormity of the attacks demands reflection, demands an attempt to understand the motives, the loss, the evil. Only then can we begin to assimilate the shock of that terrible day and its aftermath. Only then can we, as a nation, move forward.